MICHIGAN SHINES AT CHICAGO

Pulling down far more than their share of awards in all small grain classes, and scoring a clean sweep in certain fields, Michigan farmers exhibiting at the International Hay and Grain show at Chicago last week brought home the lion's share of honors. The show, which is held annually in connection with the famous International Live Stock Exposition, is the biggest crops exhibit of its kind in the country, competitors from all over the United States and Canada competing for the $10,000 prize money.

The first twenty two awards for exhibits of rye were pulled down by Michigan growers, George Hutzler of South Manitou ranking first. Rosen Rye, a Michigan variety developed by the Michigan Agricultural college some years ago and now grown all over the country, took 29 out of 39 prizes awarded for rye.

Another triumph for Michigan came in the wheat judging. Red Rock Wheat, state product, originated by the plant breeders at M. A. C., took 9 of the first 14 awards in its class.

Fine showings were made by state growers in other small grain classes, but the biggest victories were recorded in the rye and wheat fields.

Charles Laughlin of Three Oaks, took first corn honors for the Northern District at the show, while A. W. Jewett, Jr., of Mason, won second place in clover hay.

An educational exhibit of Michigan crops was one of the outstanding features of the entire show. This exhibit, which was prepared by the Agricultural college, showed the Crop improvement work of the Seed Department of the State Farm Bureau in developing, producing, and marketing fine quality seeds. An idea of the diversity and scope of Michigan crops was given by the exhibit, which attracted the attention of thousands of visitors at the big show.

J. F. Cox, head of the Crops Department at M. A. C., A. L. Bibbins, Secretary of the Michigan Crop Improvement Association; and H. C. Rather in charge of the Michigan exhibits.

Rosy Cheeks & Satin Skin

Because of her rosy cheeks and satin skin a woman attracts the admiration of all men. When the young woman peers in her glass, she may see pimples and blotches and she immediately goes to the drug store for paint, powders and beauty creams, when she should go there for a blood medicine and stomach alterative known as "Golden Medical Discovery." This vegetable tonic and blood alterative clears the skin, beautifies it, increases the blood supply and the circulation, while pimples, boils and eruptions vanish quickly. Ask your nearest druggist for Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery in tablet or liquid form or send 10c. for trial package of tablets to Dr. Pierce's Invalids' Hotel in Buffalo, N. Y.

Misael and His Guests

Bethlehem

By IRVING R. BACON.

The Messiah shall be revealed from Migdal Eder (the tower of the flock).—Targum (Aramaic translation of the Bible). Gen. xxxv. 21.

THE sun was setting in a blaze of glory, deepening the shadows which were beginning to veil from view the Hebron road stretching through the valley and across the hills, far to the westward. Four shepherds who were driving in their flocks from the four the floor for the night if only some better provision could be made for his young wife, who, he said, was an expectant mother.

"We have come from Nazareth," he said, "and have spent three days journeying hither."

"If you will accept such accommodations as I can afford," said the shepherd Misael, "I will be glad to give up my quarters to you. They are in a cave near one of the three cisterns of David and not so very far from where we first met."

"My name is Joseph," replied the elderly traveler, "and I am but a poor carpenter; but such thanks as I am able to make I hope you will accept for your kindness."

With the aid of the other shepherds Misael set the cave in as good order as so crude a place with such meager furnishings permitted. Evidently the cave had once been used as a stable, as there still was a manger in one corner of it.

And then these good shepherds went away, leaving Joseph and Mary filled with gratitude toward God for having provided them with shelter in so strange a manner and at so critical a time.

With the flute and song and stories, the shepherds entertained themselves until late into the night. The crowing of a rooster in a distant barnyard sounded strangely at variance with the sweet and mournful strains of the song.

"Why, the stars show that midnight has not yet come; I wonder what could have caused that cock to crow so early?" said one.

A star, immensely larger than any they had ever seen, gleamed mysteriously in the sky directly over their heads; and, at the same time, a luminous mist began settling over the Migdal Eder, the flock-tower, near which the shepherds had pitched their place of vigil. The mist grew brighter and brighter until it shone like the midday sun, but with a more subdued sheen, which enabled them to look at it without being blinded.

In the center of this light the winged figure of a young man of transcendent beauty appeared. What followed is best and most reverently related in the words of the gospel itself (St. Luke 2, 9 to 15):

"And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them; and they were sore afraid."

"And the angel said unto them, 'Fear not; for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.'

"For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord."

Migdal Eder (tower of the flock), which rose from the penfold near the road to Jerusalem.

These were not ordinary shepherds. They were shepherds of the flocks which were reserved for sacrificial purposes at the temple, and were regarded as men of no mean position.

This was particularly true of Misael, the chief shepherd, whose three-score-and-ten years sat upon him with a lightness and a grace which would have done credit to any man of forty.

"Children," said Misael on this particular evening when they met at their Migdal Eder, "I have been thinking all day of the marvelous memories which hallow our beloved city."

"And not only memories," broke in Acheel, the first assistant, who sought to imitate everything which he deemed so admirable in the leader; "but think of the prophecy which makes the future so glorious for Bethlehem."

"Yes," said Misael, "that is true, Acheel; 'It is here that the Messiah is to be born; but heaven only knows when that great event will come to pass. I had hoped it might be in my time; but I suppose I am too old now to dare look forward to so great a happiness.'

Misael was interrupted at this point by the advent of travelers. It was but a small party, consisting of an elderly but robust man, a radiantly beautiful girl and a donkey on the back of which the girl was sitting.

"Friends," said the elderly man, "we are belated and fear that we may not reach the caravansary at Bethlehem until darkness has closed in. Although we were born here, it is long since we have been here. My wife remembers nothing of the city; and I, too, have forgotten just where the caravansary is. Will you be kind enough to direct us to it?"

"I will gladly take you to the caravansary," said Misael. And giving hurried directions to his assistants, the shepherd led the way toward the city.

"Many have been coming through this way," he said to the travelers, "It is on account of the new census which the king is making for Rome."

The elderly traveler answered, "That is what has brought us here, too, to be enrolled under the edict of Augustus. We have been brought up to respect the law; and next to God's law and our own, that of Rome calls for our obedience now."

The caravansary's lantern was hanging lighted, in the arch of the gate when the travelers arrived there.

It looked inviting with the lights streaming out through the doors and windows; but there was not an inch of room for the newcomers.

"We are crowded far beyond our capacity," said the host in reply to the anxious query of the traveler, who said he would be satisfied to lie on

DRUGGISTS TAKE A TONIC THEMSELVES

Mr. Harrison Said Hypo-Cod Made Him Feel Like a New Man Quickly.

COULDN'T SLEEP GOOD

When a man in a drug store picks out a tonic to take himself—one may guess it is the best in the bunch. What Mr. H. W. Harrison of Rochester, Mich., formerly at the Cunningham Drug Store, 155 Woodward Ave., Detroit, Mich., says below proves Earle's Hypo-Cod is the choice of those who keep up with the latest and best things in medicine. He said:

"I hadn't felt like myself in months. Felt doxy, draggy, sort of wornout and mornings never felt like eating breakfast. Wouldn't sleep sound nights either and wake up day after day feeling as tired as when I went to bed. Had a bad cough, too. One of those deep kind and if I'd take a deep breath my chest would hurt. I conferred with several in the drug store, and it seemed to be everybody's opinion that Earle's Hypo-Cod had everything else beat—so I took some—and right here let me say it does what they claim. I'm feeling like a new man. I took two bottles and all those pains in my chest have gone and the cough disappeared like magic. It made me gain five pounds. My appetite picked up. My sleep became better and I now recommend this tonic to anyone who is in a general rundown condition," declared Mr. H. W. Harrison, 537 Harrison Ave., Rochester, Mich.

Can you imagine a more glorious feeling than to jump out of bed in the morning, after a good night's rest, and having a real appetite for breakfast? You feel like doing a real day's work, but there are thousands that do not do this and fall to take a good tonic.

When a man feels like Mr. Harrison did they should at once go down to the of the nationally known Earle Chemical Co. on bottle. Read the formula on it that druggists, chemists and experts assert is so good. It is very pleasant to taste.—Adv.

Safe Speechmaking.

"Did you lose your voice while you were making speeches?"

"No," replied Senator Sorghum. "I applied my new system of speechmaking. First I let the chairman of the reception committee take all the time he wanted to introduce me. Then after every two or three sentences I'd mention the name of Our Candidate and let the audience consume most of the time in cheering."

ASPIRIN

Name "Bayer" on Genuine

Beware! Unless you see the name "Bayer" on package or on tablets you are not getting genuine Aspirin prescribed by physicians for twenty-one years and proved safe by millions. Take Aspirin only as told in the Bayer package for Colds, Headache, Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Earache, Toothache, Lumbago, and for Pain. Handy tin boxes of twelve Bayer Tablets of Aspirin cost few cents. Druggists also sell larger packages. Aspirin is the trade mark of Bayer Manufacture of Monoaceticacidester of Salicylicacid.—Adv.

First Oil Refinery.

France is engaged in developing her oil industry, which has long been neglected. It is said that the very first efforts to refine petroleum were made at Pechelbronn. These commenced four centuries ago. To a great extent they were failures, but it is positively stated that for 180 years a refinery has been in operation at that place.

Putting Mystery to Work.

Let no one argue that because the mind is still intangible—and probably always will be to mortal man—that psychology is impracticable. Electricity is an unknown quantity; no one knows whence it cometh or whither it goeth; yet it would be hard to find anything more practical than an electric fan on a sweltering day—to take one of the least and most homely of its uses. Although mysterious, electricity can be directed, its reactions predicted, and its power ascertained. The result is that the element is exceedingly useful.—R. H. Platt, Jr., in the World's Work.

FARM PROBLEMS

The Farm Bureau has been busy for several months, according to the Farm Bureau. These new services are grain marketing, purchasing, hay marketing and legislative.

With the country's hay production 2,000,000 tons greater than last year, Michigan hay producers face a particu-among the 100,000 individuals who buy hay in the United States in carload lots. The surplus crop in the Upper Peninsula is estimated at between 2,000 and 3,000 cars and for the Thumb district between 2,000 and 2,500 cars.

Study of legislative problems was found immediately necessary, the Farm Bureau reports, because of the wide spread call for the utmost economy in state government and the demand on the part of farmers for certain kinds of protective state and national legislation.

Though farm products have increased in price, farm supplies have not, and the need for a purchasing department was also recognized. This department is expected to be organized in the near future. Speculation in market prices of farm products has been a problem for some time. The Farm Bureau is working to stabilize these prices and to help farmers get the best prices for their products.

Governor's Proclamation

I am, while I last, a proud and honored member of the Michigan Victory Medal's have not meant appreciation and I have been requested to urge all county, city, and township authorities of the State, to do everything in their power to bring this matter to the attention of the men concerned.

Applications from Western Michigan should be sent to the Army Recruiting Officer at 211 Monroe Avenue, Grand Rapids, and those from Eastern Michigan should go to the corresponding officer at 215 Woodward Avenue, Detroit.

Therefore, I, Albert E. Sleeper, Governor of the State of Michigan, do hereby request the officials named above to do what they can to stimulate the placing of applications for Victory Medals.

Albert E. Sleeper,
Governor.

Philosophy of Life.

Instead of lamenting and bemoaning what seems to be cruel life, we can, if we have the right philosophy of life, find a harmonious note in the disagreeable environment from which we cannot at present extricate ourselves. As the oyster covers with pearl the irritating sand which has got in to its shell and makes of it a thing of beauty, so we, too, with kindness, courage and good cheer, can convert the conditions which now seem unthinkable to us into sunshine and gladness.—Orison Sweet Marden.

When planning a home there are two things uppermost in the mind of the prospective home owner—permanency and general appearance. Every one likes an attractive home, and because they build only once in a lifetime they want it to last. For this reason, many people choose brick as the material of which it is to be constructed.

The home shown here is an excellent example of a small, comfortable well-built brick house, one that serves admirably the needs of the man with family and yet who cannot spend much money for a home. The walls are stout, well able to withstand the assaults of the elements, and the exterior design is very attractive. In the first place it is set back from the sidewalk on a terrace which gives the builder an opportunity to put in an imposing approach. In this case it is concrete stairs with a landing or secondary sidewalk which in turn branches out to run around the house.

The broad front porch, recessed under the sloping gable roof, is an important feature and something which has many advantages. Extending the full width of the house, it affords an excellent recreation center for the family and a playground for the children. Stout brick pillars support the roof while a rail of brick extends around on each side. Everything about this modest home gives the impression of strength and security. A roof dormer above gives light to a high attic which can be very easily converted into an extra bedroom or two if needed. Set back on the terrace, with its imposing entrance and front porch this home is well worth while considering and studying.

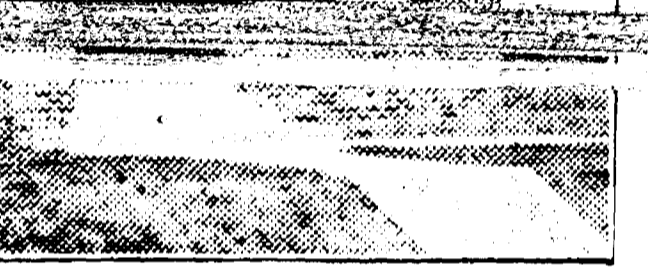

The front door opens directly into the living room, a large, spacious room, 13 by 17 feet with open brick fireplace at one side. The development of the living room in the last few years has been one of the most interesting sidelights in building construction. The present day large living room has entirely supplanted the old idea of double parlors. Instead of two rooms as the custom was a few years back, the space is given over to one large room, larger by far than any other room in the house. This living room, as it is now called, is invariably provided with a fireplace.

The dining room, 13 by 17 feet, is back of the living room and connected with it by an open doorway. It is lighted by a triple window on the side. It in turn opens into the kitchen and a hallway on one side which leads to the rear bedroom and bathroom. The kitchen is very happily arranged and is of the size now considered most efficient for the housewife. Located next to the dining room, it is only a few steps from the stove to the dining table. Off one corner from the kitchen is a delightful little breakfast nook to be used by the family when the work of preparing a big meal can be avoided. A pantry is also shown in the floor plans.

In this house we have the happy combination of permanency, beauty and economy. It is modest in its arrangement, not at all freakish or unusual and consequently not requiring special fittings which invariably mean increased expense. It fills all the requirements of the family of moderate means and above all is a real home. The owner is independent of any landlord who may see fit to raise the rent frequently and out of reason, knowing that the tenant will stay rather than take a chance of seeking new quarters in the face of the present shortage. Instead of paying rent every month, the owner can insure himself a permanent home by paying that same money on a home of this type. Rent receipts are not recognized as collateral by any bank, but a home is tangible security that can be used at any time. Many a man, father of family, who has been paying rent for years has only recently found how foolish he has been, and he found that out because he purchased a home and learned its real benefits.

It Pays to Compromise

By H. LOUIS RAYBOLD

(©, 1920, by McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

"Fifty acres, at least," said Peter firmly.

"Two acres at most," retorted Betty quite as firmly.

And then these two very positive, very young people sat regarding each other defiantly, each secretly hoping the other would weakly yield with a "Well, have it your own way." But, as it happened, neither did.

The circumstances, to be brief, were as follows: Peter and Betty expected to be married in exactly two weeks. Their itinerary was planned down to the very last railroad ticket. But—and this was relevant to the subject under discussion—they had as yet no place to which to return when the honeymoon was over.

Peter boarded, and so did Betty. And their strongest emotion, except their love for each other, was a prejudice against boarding any longer. Betty had visions of a softly-lighted living room not shared with sixteen other roomers, while Peter had dreams of pies not made with substitutes and then divided into innumerable small pieces.

Out of this feeling had emerged the desire for a real home—a home with a capital H. And gradually had grown a vision of a home in the country with vegetable gardens and cows and chickens and, yes, bees and a pig. As the fancy grew, Peter saw himself a full-fledged farmer, able to look the cost of living defiantly in the face. That is he saw himself a farmer in between times when he was not earning his salary as a modestly paid employee of Campbell & Westcott, wholesale grocers.

Therein lay the hitch. "Peter," urged Betty, "if we get a place with and dormer windows. On either side the land appeared to extend indefinitely, but the size of the picture prevented one telling the amount of actual acreage.

"It's a bargain, all right," the agent was declaring with what really seemed to be genuine sincerity rather than the conventional praise that was part of his stock in trade. "Seven rooms—all improvements—on the trolley—five minutes from churches, stores and school. Land in excellent condition, mostly tilled. Stalls for three horses, stanchions—"

"How much," with one eye on Betty, Peter was about to put the vital question, but the agent misunderstood.

"Four thousand dollars—half cash, rest on easy terms, part bank mortgage."

Yes, that part was all right, but "How many acres?"

"Oh," said the agent in surprise. "Thought I told you that before. Twenty-six."

Peter watched Betty to see how she took it. Her brow was furrowed as if in mental calculation. Then, "Let's look at it," she said noncommittally.

That evening the agent took them out in his car. After walking over the fields and through the orchards, after inspecting the gray-shingled house, the agent thoughtfully left them to themselves on the veranda to arrive at a decision.

Shyly, Betty's hand stole into Peter's. "It seems like home to me already," she said.

"Same here," nodded Peter. "And wasn't it lucky about the amount of land? The twenty-six acres made it possible for us both to give in equally." Then, as Betty's clear gray eyes lifted to his, Peter unburdened his soul. "I've got to confess, Betty," he began. "I saw that ad about the farm some time ago and called up the agent about it. I saw it was a chance, but I was afraid if I told you it was twenty-six acres instead of your prescribed two, you would refuse to consider it. So I pretended that evening I called to hold out for fifty, hoping that when you saw what a crackerjack the place was, you would be willing to give in to twenty-four acres more, thinking I me, darling?"

Betty's eyes sparkled, as she yielded to the pressure of his arm which was drawing her close in the screen of the twilight. "Of course, you silly old Peter," she said. "I had telephoned about that ad myself."

PEACE USE FOR WAR MASKS

Hopes That Had Been Entertained of Their Value Have Proved Fallacious, It Is Said.

When our soldiers came back from "over there" they were wildly enthusiastic on the subject of gas masks, and were convinced that they could be utilized to advantage in mines and in factories where poisonous gases are sometimes encountered.

The fire departments of our cities thought that they would afford protection to firemen, and were anxious to adopt them.

It was a mistake. In a big fire the chief danger, so far as gases are concerned, is from carbon monoxide. But the war mask is of no use against carbon monoxide. It has no value against ammonia gas or ordinary illuminating gas.

Furthermore, the conditions in a factory or a mine are very different from those of the open air of a battlefield. In open air a poisonous gas is so diluted that the atmosphere contains only a small percentage of it. Indoors or underground it may easily be so concentrated that the war mask affords no effective protection.

The chief constituent of the gases in a mine after a fire or an explosion is the deadly carbon monoxide, which the war mask will not filter out. Though the United States bureau of mines explained this to the fire departments, they were unconvinced until they had tried the thing out. Then they agreed.

As a protection against smoke the war mask does first-rate service. So far as that goes, it is highly satisfactory, if fitted with a canister containing filter pads.

The bureau of mines is of the opinion that the final solution of the mask problem for firemen will be reached by the construction of a canister three times the war size, and containing, in addition to the war filling (charcoal, lime and filter pads), special absorbents for ammonia gas and carbon monoxide.

One should, of course, not confuse the war mask with the oxygen apparatus used in mines, which renders the wearer independent of any breathing supply from outside. In its latest development it is a highly scientific contrivance, and a man equipped with it could live for a while in an atmosphere of pure carbon monoxide.

Its Description.

"How could a rich florist's pile best be described?" "I should think it might be called a flower barrel."

TAKE TIME TO SMILE

NOT LIKELY.

"The defendant says he donated his time and talents to the candidate's campaign without pay or hope of reward."

"And what did the prosecuting attorney say to that?"

"He asked the gentlemen of the jury in sarcastic tones if they could conceive of the defendant giving anything so valuable and getting nothing in return but a slap on the back."

The Measures Table.

"How many pints to a quart?"

"Two."

"Correct. Now how many quarts to a gallon?"

"Four."

"Right, Willie. That is all for today."

"No, teacher, there's one more question. I know how many miles in a gallon, too."

Queer Proceeding.

"Boddles has a very paradoxical way of conducting his business."

"How so?"

GENERAL APPEARANCE

"By her husband."

Avoiding Danger.

Oh, bring the dunce cap out anew. Since crime affects to be refined; if thus attired I go on view I can't be called "a master mind."

Moving an Audience.

"Yes," replied Senator Sorghum. "But at the new rates of transportation I doubt whether we can afford it."

No Limit.

"A man is never too old to learn."

"That," said Miss Cayenne, "may apply to books or industrial occupations, but never to dancing."

The Proof.

"There goes a horny-handed man of toil."

"Who is he?"

"He works with one in the theater orchestra."

Use for Him.

"His language is enough to make one's hair curl."

"Then why doesn't the boob get a good-paying job in a ladies' hair-dressing establishment?"

"Well the Pilgrims are dead and won't feel it."

EXCELLENT PLAN FOR SMALL HOME

Five-Room Brick House Has Air of Permanency.

INTERIOR WELL ARRANGED

Substantially-Built Home Has Well-Designed Exterior and Large Front Porch—Strength and Security the Features.

In this house the front bedroom opens off the living room. It is 13 by 10 feet with windows on front and side. Too often in building a home the owner overlooks the windows in the sleeping room. The old ideas of ventilation have been shuffled into the discard and plenty of air is now the demand. The dining room, 13 by 17 feet, is back of the living room and connected with it by an open doorway. It is lighted by a triple window on the side. It in turn opens into the kitchen and a hallway on one side which leads to the rear bedroom and bathroom. FAMOUS HOUSE STILL STANDS

Mansion Erected by Thomas Hancock on Beacon Hill, Boston, Splendid Piece of Architecture.

The first house of distinction to be built on Beacon Hill, in Boston, the highest of three elevations which gave to the city the name of "Tri-mountain," and which was the center of military, social and religious life, was erected by Thomas Hancock, an uncle of the Revolutionary hero. This was in 1737.

It was a beautiful mansion, built of stone, with the ground laid out in orchards and gardens, and it was here that the first tree nursery in Boston was started. Inside great taste was shown in the furnishings, the drawing-room containing a rare set of bird's-eye maple, covered with red damask. Hancock was a lavish host, and gave a famous breakfast to the officers of the French fleet.

While the French troops were in Boston forty or more of the officers dined at the house every day. On one occasion, however, so many unexpected guests appeared that a maid Hancock was driven to despair to know how to provide for them, so she had servants milk all the cows pastured on the common, whether this was agreeable to their owners or not. The house is yet considered a splendid piece of architecture.

He Went, Anyway.

"Let's see, your cousin went abroad on a fellowship, didn't he?" "No it was on a cattle ship."

If people wouldn't bite until they find out whether it is bread or stone there would be fewer dental parlors.

It Pays to Compromise

"Fifty acres, at least," said Peter firmly.

And gradually had grown a vision of a home in the country with vegetable gardens and cows and chickens and, yes, bees and a pig. As the fancy grew, Peter saw himself a full-fledged farmer, able to look the cost of living defiantly in the face. That is he saw himself a farmer in between times when he was not earning his salary as a modestly paid employee of Campbell & Westcott, wholesale grocers.

Therein lay the hitch. "Peter," urged Betty, "if we get a place with our own name, better go slow and over a small piece thoroughly than over a lot of idle fields on our hands growing sour for lack of crops." Betty had not been perusing the agricultural bulletins for nothing.

"Very well," said Peter stiffly. "But, if we are going in for this sort of thing, we ought to do it on a big enough scale to make it worth while, with enough acres to raise the hay to feed the horses that do the plowing that prepares the fields that yield the crops."

"It sounds like the house that Jack built," giggled Betty. Then, seriously, "Well, all I can say is that I won't be a party to any such foolishness. Besides, after saying right along that you would be satisfied with twenty-five acres, you are jacking it up to fifty! It's absurd."

And that is the point at which the story begins.

Peter went home very shortly and tried to forget that he and Betty were indulging in their first quarrel. But even as he attempted to interest himself in an informing volume for back to the landers, Betty's piquant little face as she defied him danced between the lines. "Two acres, at most!" she had insisted.

You see Peter had seen in the paper an advertisement of a farm for sale with considerably more than two acres of land, and a telephone convinced him that it was a decidedly worth-while buy. Hence it was up to him, by fair means or foul, to persuade Betty likewise.

Next morning Betty was summoned from breakfast by a telephone call. Peter didn't usually call her at such an early hour. Eight o'clock it was. He must have just reached the office.

"Hello—yes—this is Betty—yes—tell me about it."

The substance of the call was this: Peter had come across an advertisement (he didn't say when) advertising a farm for sale. According to Peter there wasn't much else to the item but that simple fact. At least it made no mention of stocks or tools or improvements. Of course, it might not be at all what they wanted, but would Betty please meet him during his noon hour and call with him at the agent's, in whose name it was listed?

After a moment, Betty agreed. It was true that Peter had departed the night before without his usual kiss and she had intended to hold him to account. But, after all, her interest in securing a home far outweighed any petty desire for punishment. So she promised to meet him, and hung up the receiver.

Peter found her at the time agreed upon and, as his eyes fell on the trim figure in the smart little suit with the perky hat with the mercury wings projecting from either side, he mentally registered the statement that he was a lucky chap.

A few minutes later they gazed enraptured at a photograph of a low-nosed farmhouse with broad veranda and dormer windows. On either side the land appeared to extend indefinitely, but the size of the picture prevented one telling the amount of actual acreage.

"It's a bargain, all right," the agent was declaring with what really seemed to be genuine sincerity rather than the conventional praise that was part of his stock in trade. "Seven rooms—all improvements—on the trolley—five minutes from churches, stores and school. Land in excellent condition, mostly filled. Stalls for three horses, stanchions—"

RECORD MADE IN COLLECTING TAX

MORE THAN FIVE BILLION DOLLARS RECEIVED BY BUREAU.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX LARGEST

Tobacco Users Pay $295,809,355 into Treasury; Departing Aliens Yield $13, 117,788.

Washington.—Collection of $5,407,80,251 in taxes, and efforts to control the liquor traffic formed the principal work of the internal revenue bureau during the last fiscal year, commissioner Williams reports.

The tax collection was the greatest in the history of the nation, he added, while in prohibition enforcement the bureau was faced with the creation of an organization which embraced all states and Hawaii, Porto Rico and Alaska.

Income and profits tax made up the bulk of the revenue obtained by the government. The report shows that an additional $295,809,355 came from tobacco taxes. The levy on distilled and fermented liquors produced $139,401,149 and miscellaneous and war excise taxes brought in $883,863,871. The remainder of the revenue was from capital stock, stamp and special taxation.

Mr. Williams noted the collection of $13,117,788 from aliens who were departing for their native lands after a temporary residence in the United States.

The report said the government had employed the permit system as one of its chief methods of controlling the liquor traffic as its sources.

THE GREAT SHADOW

By A. CONAN DOYLE

Author of The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes

From where we stood it was a sight now that was worth coming over the seas to see. On our own ridge was the checker of red and blue, stretching right away to a village over two miles from us. It was whispered from man to man in the ranks, however, that there was too much of the blue and too little of the red, for the Belgians had shown on the day before that their hearts were too soft for the work, and we had twenty thousand of them for comrades. Then even our British troops were half made up of militiamen and recruits, for the pick of the old Peninsula regiments were on the ocean in transports, coming back from some fool's errand with our kinsfolk of America. But for all that we could see the bearskins of the Guards, two strong brigades of them, and the bonnets of the Highlanders, and the blue of the old German legion, and the red lines of Pack's brigade, and Kempt's brigade, and the green-dotted riflemen in front; and we knew that, come what might, these were men who would hide where they were placed, and that they had a man to lead them who would place them where they should hide.

Of the French we had seen little, save the twinkle of their fires and a few horsemen here and there on the curves of the ridge; but as we stood and waited there came suddenly a whole army came flooding over the low hill when had hid them—brigade after brigade, and division after division—until the broad slope in its whole length and depth was blue with their uniforms and bright with the glint of their weapons. It seemed that they would never have done, still pouring over and pouring over, while our men leaned on their muskets and smoked their pipes, looking down at this grand gathering and listening to what the old soldiers, who had fought the French before, had to say about them. Then, when the infantry had formed in long, deep masses, their guns came whirling and bounding down the slope, and it was pretty to see how smartly they unlimbered and were ready for action. And then, at a stately trot, down came the cavalry—thirty regiments at the least, with plume and breastplate, twinkling sword and fluttering lance—forming up at the flanks and rear in long, shifting, glimmering lines.

"Them's the chaps," cried our old sergeant. "They're gluttons to fight, they are. And you see them regiments with the great high hats in the middle, a bit behind the farm? That's the Guard—twenty thousand of them, my sons, and all picked men—gray-headed devils that have done nothing but fight since they were as high as my gaiters. They've three men to our two, and two guns to one, and, by gad! they'll make you recruits wish you were back in Argyle street before they have finished with you." He was not a cheering man, our sergeant, but then he had been in every fight since Corunna, and had a medal with seven clasps upon his breast, so that he had a right to talk in his own fashion.

When the Frenchmen had arranged themselves just out of cannon shot we saw a small group of horsemen, all in a blaze with silver and scarlet and gold, ride swiftly between the divisions; and as they went a roar of cheering burst out from either side of them, and we could see arms outstretched to them and hands waving. An instant later the noise had died away and the two armies stood facing each other in absolute deadly silence—a sight which often comes back to me in my dreams. Then of a sudden there was a lurch among the men just in front of us, a thin column wheeled off from the dense blue clump, and came swinging up toward the farmhouse which lay below us. It had not taken fifty paces before a gun banged out from an English battery on our left and the battle of Waterloo had begun.

It is not for me to tell you the story of that battle, and indeed I should have kept far enough away from such a thing had it not happened that our own fate—those of the three simple folk who came from the border country—were all just as much mixed up in it as those of any king or emperor of them all. To tell the honest truth, I have learned more about that battle from what I have read than from what I saw, for how much could I see with a comrade on either side, and a great white cloud bank at the very end of my firelock? It was from books and the talk of others that I learned how the heavy cavalry charged, how they rode over the famous cuirassiers, and how they were cut to pieces before they could get back. From them, too, I learned all about the successive assaults, and how the Belgians fled, and how Pack and Kempt stood firm. But of my own knowledge I can only speak of what we saw during that long day in the rifts of the smoke and the lulls of the firing, and it's just of that that I will tell you.

We were on the right of the line and in reserve, for the Duke was afraid that Boney might work round on that side and get at him from behind, so our three regiments, with another British brigade and the Hanoverians, were placed there to be ready for anything. There were two brigades of light cavalry, too, but the French attack was all from the front, so it was late in the day before we were really wanted.

The English battery which fired the first gun was still banging away on our left, and a German one was hard at work upon our right, so that we were wrapped round with the smoke, but we were not so hidden as to screen us from a line of French guns opposite, for a score of round shot came pipping through the air and plumped right into the heart of us. As I heard the scream of them pass my ear my head went down like a diver, but our sergeant gave me a prod in the back with the handle of his halbert.

"Don't be so blasted polite," said he. "When you're hit you can bow once and for all."

There was one of those balls that knocked five men into a bloody mash, and I saw it lying on the ground afterwards, like a crimson football. Another went through the adjutant's horse with a pop, like a stone in the mud, broke its back and left it lying like a burst gooseberry. Three more fell farther to the right, and by the stir and cries we could tell that they had all told.

"Ah, James, you've lost a good mount," says Major Reed, just in front of me, looking down at the adjutant, whose boots and breeches were all running with blood.

"I gave a cool fifty for him in Glasgow, but the men had better lie down, now that the guns have got our range."

"Tut!" said the other. "They are young, James, and it will do them good."

"They'll get enough of it before the day's done," grumbled the other, but at that moment Colonel Reynell saw that the Rifles and the Fifty-second were down on either side of us, so we had the order to stretch ourselves out too. Precious glad we were when we could hear the shot whining like hungry dogs within a few feet of our backs. Even now a thud and a splash every minute or so, with a yelp of pain and a drumming of boots upon the ground, told us that we were still losing heavily.

A thin rain was falling and the damp air held the smoke low, so that we could only catch glimpses of what was doing just in front of us, though the roar of the guns told us that the battle was general all along the lines. Four hundred of them were all crashing at once now, and the noise was enough to split the drum of your ear. Indeed, there was not one of us but had a singing in his head for many a long day afterward. Just opposite us, on the slope of a hill, was a French gun, and we could see the men serving her quite plainly. They were small, active men with very tight breeches and high hats with great, straight plumes sticking up from them, but they worked like sheep shearers, ramming and sponging and training. There were fourteen when I saw them first, and only four left standing at the last, but they were working away just as hard as ever.

The farm that they called Hougoumont was down in front of us, and all morning we could see that a terrible fight was going on there, for the walls and the windows and the orchard hedges were all flame and smoke, and there rose such shrieking and crying from it as I never heard before. It was half burned down, and shattered with balls, and ten thousand men were hammering at the gates, but four hundred guardsmen held it in the morning, and two hundred held it in the evening, and no French foot was ever set within its threshold. But how they fought, those Frenchmen! Their lives were no more to them than the mud under their feet. There was one—I can see him now—a stoutish, ruddy man on a crutch. He hobbled up alone in a lull of the firing to the side gate of Hougoumont, and he beat upon it, screaming to his men to come after him. For five minutes he stood there, strolling about in front of the gun-barrels which spared him, but at last a Brunswick skirmisher in the orchard flicked out his brain with a rifle-shot. And he was only one of many, for all day, when they did not come in masses they came in twos and threes, with as brave a face as if the whole army was at their heels.

So we lay all morning looking down at the fight at Hougoumont; but soon the Duke saw that there was nothing to fear upon his right, and so he began to use us in another way. The French had pushed their skirmishers past the farm, and they lay among the young corn in front of us, popping at the gunners, so that three pieces out of six on our left were lying with their men strewn in the mud all round them. But the Duke had his eyes everywhere, and up he galloped at that moment, a thin, dark, wiry man, with very bright eyes, a hooked nose, and a big cockade on his cap. There were a dozen officers at his heels, all as merry as if it were a fox-hunt; but of the dozen there was not one left in the evening.

"Warm work, Adams," said he as he rode up.

"Very warm, your grace," said our general.

"But we can outstay them at it, I think! Tut! tut! we cannot let skirmishers silence a battery. Just drive those fellows out of that, Adams."

Then first I knew what a devil's thrill runs through a man when he is given a bit of fighting to do. Up to now we had just lain and been killed, which is the weariest kind of work. Now it was our turn, and, my word, we were ready for it. Up we jumped, the whole brigade, in a four-deep line, and rushed at the cornfield as hard as we could tear. The skirmishers snapped at us as we came, and then away they bolted like corn-crackers, their heads down, their backs rounded, and their muskets at the trail. Half of them got away, but we caught up the others, the officer first, for he was a very fat man who could not run fast. It gave me quite a turn when I saw Rob Stewart on my right stick his bayonet into the man's broad back and heard him howl like a lost soul. There was no quarter in that field, and it was butt or point for all of them. The men's blood was aflame, and little wonder, for those wasps had been stinging all morning without our being able so much as see them.

And now, as we broke through the farther edge of the cornfield we got in front of the smoke, and there was the whole French army in position before us, with only two meadows and a narrow lane between us. We set up a yell as we saw them, and away we should have gone, slap at them, if we young soldiers never think that harm could come to us. But the Duke had cantered his horse beside us as we advanced, and now he roared something to the general, and the officers all rode in front of our line, holding out their arms for us to stop. There was a blowing of bugles, a pushing and a shoving, with the sergeants cursing and digging us with their halberts, and in less time than it takes me to write it there was the brigade in three neat little squares, all bristling with bayonets and in echelon, as they call it, so that each could fire across the face of the other.

It was the saving of us, as even so young a soldier as I was could very easily see. And we had none too much time, either. There was a low, rolling hill on our right flank, and from behind this there came a sound like nothing on this earth so much as the beat of the waves on Berwick coast when the wind blows from the east. The earth was all shaking with that dull, roaring sound, and the air was full of it. "Steady, Seventy-first, for God's sake, steady!" shrieked the voice of our colonel behind us, but in front was nothing but the green, gentle slope of the grassland, all mottled with daisies and dandelion.

And then suddenly, over the curve, we saw eight hundred brass helmets rise up, all in a moment, each with a long tag of horsehair flying from its crest, and then eight hundred fierce brown faces, all pushed forward, and glaring out from between the ears of as many horses. There was an instant of gleaming breast-plates, waving swords, tossing manes, fierce red nostrils opening and shutting, and hoofs pawing the air before us, and then down came the line of muskets, and our bullets smacked up against their armor like the clatter of a hailstorm upon a window. I fired with the rest, and then rammed down another charge as fast as I could, starting out through the smoke in front of me, where I could see some long, thin thing, which flapped slowly backward and forward. A bugle sounded for us to cease firing, and a whiff of wind came to clear the curtain from in front of us, and then we could see what had happened.

Vegetable Beef-Steaks.

The vegetable beef-steak grows on the oak tree. It is fungus, which is dark red above and flesh-colored below. When it is cut through, the alternate dark and light streaks exactly resemble the joint from which it gets its name. It is a wholesome article of food.

During a wet season this fungus grows about seven feet from the ground. It may be broiled, stewed, fried, or, if preferred, treated like beetroot and added to the salad bowl.

GRAIN

The feeling became general throughout the grain trade during the week that grain prices were already too low for the welfare of the agricultural and business interests of the country, and prices closed higher than a week ago. A reconstruction of sentiment took place if not actually a reconstruction of grain prices basis. Export sales were heavy and demand for cash wheat for export good at firm prices. Excellent demand for cash corn. Flour demand improved slightly as indicated by better milling demand for wheat. At the farmers' national grain dealers association convention on the 2nd the president of the association announced an association slogan "Buy a barrel of flour now while the price is right." If You Need a Medicine You Should Have the Best

Have you ever stopped to reason why it is that so many products that are extensively advertised, all at once drop out of sight and are soon forgotten? The reason is plain—the article did not fulfill the promises of the manufacturer. This applies more particularly to a medicine. A medicinal preparation that has real curative value almost sells itself, as like an endless chain system the remedy is recommended by those who have been benefited, to those who are in need of it. A prominent druggist says "Take for example Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, a preparation I have sold for many years and never hesitate to recommend, for in almost every case it shows excellent results, as many of my customers testify. No other kidney remedy has so large a sale."

According to sworn statements and verified testimony of thousands who have used the preparation, the success of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root is due to the fact, so many people claim, that it fulfills almost every wish in overcoming kidney, liver and bladder ailments; corrects urinary troubles and neutralizes the uric acid which causes rheumatism. You may receive a sample bottle of Swamp-Root by Parcel Post. Address Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y., and enclose ten cents; also mention this paper. Large and medium size bottles for sale at all drug stores.—Adv.
